Innovations for smallholders in irrigation

Today drip irrigation is spreading fast across the world, both in formal settings (via state subsidies to farmers) and informal private investment. New business opportunities arise in the resale of used equipment and installation of equipment at the local level. Drip irrigation develops a lot for small farmers who are innovative in adapting technology to their needs.

What are the processes of adoption and adaptation of this technology by small farmers? What are the in situ technical economic and environmental performances? How to encourage convergence between agricultural and environmental policies and initiatives at the local level?
Wastewater use in agriculture

Tensions over water resources and development of peri-urban agriculture generates an increasing massive use of wastewater in agriculture. The use of such water is regulated by the policies of many countries that have issued standard treatments to define their possible uses (agricultural food and non-food, green areas). However the actual use of these waters by farmers does often not comply with these rules with health and environmental consequences. In contrast, other countries where this resource useful supplements conventional resources prohibit or severely restrict its use by an excessive application of the precautionary principle.

What are the lessons learnt from the use of wastewater in agriculture? What are health and environmental consequences?

Governance of surface water and groundwater

Groundwater use is increasing worldwide due to the easy access to the resource. It generates a groundwater economy but creates the conditions for overuse. Access to groundwater occurs most often individually but with many arrangements processes resulting in the establishment of informal groundwater markets at the local level. This is occurring both within irrigated schemes with groundwater questioning the conventional surface water governance, or outside the schemes with limited water renewal.

How to define groundwater governance rules from local experiences? How to integrate governance of surface water and groundwater?
